REGAL
INVESTMENT FUND

FEBRUARY 2025

The Regal Investment Fund ("RF1") Net Asset Value ("NAV") decreased by -2.2% to $3.36 in February. Since inception on 17 June 2019, the Fund has generated 18.0% p.a. net of fees.¹

Global equity markets experienced heightened volatility through February, with the bulk of developed equity markets generating negative returns over the month. US equities led declines, with both the S&P 500 and the tech-heavy Nasdaq 100 falling by -1.4% and -4.0% respectively, as markets sought to digest the impact of escalating trade tensions, tariff concerns and emerging inflationary pressures from increased US federal spending. Smaller companies bore the brunt of macroeconomic headwinds with the US small cap Russell 2000 index falling by more than -5.5% over the month. In Australia, the Reserve Bank's first interest rate cut since November 2020 was met with mixed reactions, as concerns continue to linger over persistent inflation and a near-full employment market. Domestic equity markets in Australia mirrored that of global peers with the S&P/ASX 300 declining by -3.8% and the Small Ordinaries Index falling by -2.8%.

Positive contributors to performance this month were led by the Private Credit strategy but were outweighed by detractors across the long/short equity portion of the Fund.

Main detractors this month stemmed from the Small Companies strategy specifically in long positions held across the Health Care sector. Negative contributors included long a position in regenerative medicine biotech Mesoblast (-21%), which declined over the month despite significant momentum behind its Ryoncil drug development, and a position in the diagnostic imaging and healthcare services space, Integral Diagnostics Ltd (-32%) after the stock came under pressure in February following a weaker than expected result.
